Summary/Abstract: We did not notice when the carrot disappeared, but we felt the stick on our back real good," Goran Aleksić, member of the Journalist Association of Serbia wrote in his book of aphorisms. The "stick and carrot" policy is a term often used for the politics of conditionality. The subject gained topicality with the emerging of the so-called democratic conditioning, i.e. the second generation of conditionality developed in the 1990s in an effort to promote human rights and democratization of political communities. The purpose of this text is a theoretical analysis of the policy of conditionality. The author's thesis is that this policy is by its nature invariably coercive, namely that there is always a stick behind it. More precisely, we could discuss the degree of coerciveness and the strategy of conditionality applied to a specific case, but not its nature. Finally, this paper shall also present the theoretical models of conditionality strategies offered by Schimmelfenning, Engert and Knobel in their analysis of the EU conditionality policy.

ABOUT A QUARTER CENTURY ago, in 1993, I said, in my American Dissident Voices broadcast titled "All America Must Know the Terror That is Upon Us," the following: "To determine the true rulers of any society, all you must do is ask yourself this question: Who is it that I am not permitted to criticize?" I've said the same thing in slightly different words from time to time too, such as "To learn who rules over you Carrot or Stick is a 7th season episode of House which first aired on January 24, 2011. An instructor at a military style detention camp collapses. The team is stumped until one of the teenagers at the camp is admitted with similar symptoms and the team finds something else they have in common... The patient wants to know who did it and realizes that Masters doesn't trust him. He apologizes to Masters for hurting her. However, the patient develops a tachycardia and Foreman calls for a crash cart. Masters asks the instructor why he didn't come forward when Landon's mother died. He tells her Landon was already in foster care. The instructor won't admit to it now because it will only make him look like a hard-ass and if he dies that's how Landon will remember him.
