Trading Beyond the Mountains. The British Fur Trade on the Pacific, 1793-1843, by Richard Somerset Mackie (Vancouver: U. of British Columbia P., 1997; PP. xxiv + 420. $75), is a study of Pacific trade based upon Canadian sources. It does not deal with Canada proper but with the American West in the era before it was shared out between Britain and the USA. In particular it focuses upon the regions dominated by the river systems of the Columbia and the Fraser, which became the province of British Columbia and the three states of Oregon, Washington and California. The period covered is that of the Industrial Revolution, but the main theme is one of commercial rather than industrial expansion. The main agent in the story, the Hudson's Bay Company, developed a commerce in beaver fur in order to supply the demands of the unmechanized hatting industry. The profits of Lancashire cotton spinners were far surpassed by those generated by the Columbia Department of the Company, averaging some 48% of turnover in 1830-43. The model of trade was primarily one of barter and...

Mackie (1997, Trade Paperback) at the best online prices at eBay! Free shipping for many products! This books examines the Hudson's Bay company exploration efforts beyond the Rocky Mountains to the Pacific Ocean from 1793 to 1843 - which led to the commercial development of the Pacific coast and the Cordilleran interior of western North America. Product Identifiers. Publisher. University of British Columbia Press. ISBN-10. 0774806133. During the late 18th and early 19th centuries, the North West and Hudson's Bay companies extended their operations to the Pacific Ocean, where, with the aid of Native traders, they branched out into farming, fishing, logging, and mining. Mackie shows how the well-capitalized Hudson's Bay Company created a regional economy on the Pacific coast and documents how the Native people played a part in the emerging economy and how, in myriad ways, they paid for contact with British commerce. Download from icerbox.com. Publication archive.
