Abstract/Description:

Children are not born with knowing what beauty is. Instead, children learn about beauty through their experiences. This study will examine the messages of beauty children receive from illustrated books and the beauty messages parents are advised to instill in their children in parenting books. This study will also evaluate the messages of race and gender that underlie these messages of beauty. The analysis will take place through a qualitative analysis of five illustrated children's books dealing with ethnic hair, five illustrated children's books dealing with body image, and four parenting books that focus on body image.

Comprehension Activities: Teaching With Picture Books. My children are like oversized sponges. They soak up knowledge and retain it in a way that my brain is no longer capable of. Engage your child in an absorbing picture book, and then use that book to slip in a few teaching moments with your captive audience to improve their reading comprehension skills. There are some fantastic picture books out there on every imaginable subject with gorgeous illustrations and riveting text, that cannot fail to enthrall your child. The images in picture books are perfect for sparking your child's imagination and prompting them to want to find out more. Most picture books are reasonably short and so you still have time to fit in an activity around it without your child losing concentration. picturebook, picturebooks, books, visual, book, chapter, art, artists, text, publishing, kind permission, book illustration, picture books, publishing industry, young readers, professional case, random house, student case, publishing houses, picture book.
