The spotty record of the production and reception of his sensational Western fiction offers intriguing glimpses into several dusty corners of Canada's book history and cultural history because he published two books with Graphic Press and because one of his novels became "Canada's First All-talking Picture" (see Figure 1). (3). Founded in Ottawa in 1924 by Henry C. Miller, the Graphic Press has been canonized in Canadian book history as a brave nationalist venture that attempted to alter the nature of early twentieth-century publishing by producing books that were entirely made in Canada. How Graphic came to publish Philip remains a mystery, given Philip's isolation on the west coast and lack of apparent connection with any of Graphic's authors or editors. The printing press is one of the world's most important inventions. The quick and easy distribution of information would change the course of printing history. In fact, the history of the printing press stretches back to the 3rd Century (the technique of woodblock printing but on textiles) with its adaptation for printing text in wide use during the Tang Dynasty of China (6th-10th Century AD).
