
This volume is interlaced with the King James biblical cadences and interwoven themes of author Charles Bowden and the stunning and suggestive black and white photography of Michael Berman. As one expects of any book Bowden is involved in, Inferno, with its Dantean title, flames into far more than its beautiful layout and coffee table book appearance imply. Bowden, a major warrior in successfully establishing the Sonoran Desert National Monument near his Tucson, Arizona, home, terms it "the same inferno I want to call home." Yet in the book's preface, he broaches the ephemerality of our nation and of monuments, maintaining that when both are gone, the desert itself will remain, and its "ground will still burn with the honest face of life."

Many recognizable Bowden themes, albeit glimpsed from new angles and given new nuances, are strong presences in the book: the gross inadequacy and abstractness of the terms "nature" and "nature writing"; a healthy skepticism toward being a member in a movement, a "true believer" of whatever stripe, whether through "obedience"...
