Sublime du grand homme et beauté du parti politique chez Edmund Burke

The sublime of the great man and the beauty of the political party at Edmund Burke

Author(s): Norbert Col

Subject(s): Language and Literature Studies

Published by: Universitatea Petrol-Gaze din Ploiești

Keywords: Beau; sublime; grand homme; parti; constitution

Summary/Abstract: Il est peu de concepts plus ambigus, chez Edmund Burke, que celui de « grand homme ». Il permet cependant de découvrir un Burke à des années lumière des clichés. Cette contribution relie le constitutionnalisme politique de Burke à l'esthétique, plus ancienne, de Sublime and Beautiful et, bien que de manière indirecte, donne des arguments en faveur de la cohérence de sa pensée tout au long de sa carrière. Burke, qui n'admirait pas naïvement la grandeur en politique, y aurait vu, dans l'ensemble, une source de danger et de désagréables idées révolutionnaires.

Burke proposes that beauty stimulates love, but that the sublime excites horror. While beauty relaxes, the sublime brings tension. The feeling that something is sublime is triggered by extremes – vastness, extreme height, difficulty, darkness or excessive light. When discussing infinity, Burke uses the phrase 'delightful horror' to describe the 'truest test of the sublime'. Delight for Burke is the removal of pain. When we realise that horror portrayed in the arts is fictional, this allows us to experience pleasure. Professor Philip Shaw considers how Romantic writers thought about the grandest and most terrifying aspects of nature, and the ways in which their writing responded to and influenced theories of the sublime.
