Codes of Conduct for Public Officials in Europe: Common Label, Divergent Purposes

David Hine

Public Ethics and Governance: Standards and Practices in Comparative Perspective
ISSN: 0732-1317
Publication date: 4 April 2006

Abstract
Codes of conduct have been adopted very broadly on both sides of the Atlantic in the last two decades. They have been introduced for both elected representatives and appointed officials. Though the accountability mechanisms vary, elected politicians prefer self-policing and enforcement. For appointed officials who carry out specialized functions with exposure to particular, clearly identifiable, ethical risks, where the need for public trust and confidence is great, it is important but also relatively straightforward to develop codes of practice. For generalist public servants, the situation is different. The range of ethical risk to which civil servants are exposed is broader. It is less easy to be specific about the risks involved.

Citation

To read the full version of this content please select one of the options below
You may be able to access this content by logging in via Shibboleth, Open Athens or with your Emerald Account.
If you think you should have access to this content, click the button to contact our support team.