The Voynich manuscript is one of the most mysterious books in the world. This is predominantly because no one knows exactly what it is except that it is filled with ancient text and mysterious pictures. The manuscript's very existence implies that it has passed through many hands in antiquity. Each person who has come into contact with the book is captivated and curious to discover its secrets. It is commonly believed the manuscript is encoded, but whether the book is written in an unknown language or mumbo jumbo has yet to be discovered. The History of the Manuscript. In 1912, there was 2. Christus namque secundum quod via est magister et principium cognitionis, quae est per fidem. Where, therefore, have they been written except in the book of that light, which is called the Truth, whence every just law is described, and (whence) justice, not by migrating into the heart of a man, but as if by being impressed is transferred »? Indeed the entire difficulty consists in reading the first word of this Latin sentence, Talis, as a nominative adjective modifying light, rather as a genitive referring to the certitude of the first sentence, and in this way understanding a parallel structure with the second sentence, which by beginning with This [Haec] refers to the same certitude; on this basis the English translation proceeds.] In the Exeter Book is preserved a collection of some ninety riddles in alliterative verse. These riddles are descriptions or characterizations of objects, from which the object itself, which is not named, must be guessed. When the Old English poet, instead of naming the sea, called it the seals' bath, or instead of naming the ship, called it the ocean-stallion, he resorted to a familiar device of Germanic poetry known as the kenning. No. 11 of the Exeter Book. This puzzling riddle has been responsible for much ingenious guesswork. Among the answers suggested are the following: Ocean-furrow, Wake of a Vessel, Water-bubble, Anchor, Water-lily!
