Bluebells and mud. Braved the rain, the wind and the mud and went to see the bluebells. We slithered, slipped and slid – my jeans are mud to the knees, and my boots rigidly encased in clay. It was worth it of course. There is nothing like that cathedral of soaring birch rising from the lake of blue. The mud, after all, is only on the path. The recognisable flowers of the bluebell carpet our woodlands in an enchanting sweep of purple every year - a nature spectacle not to be missed. Bluebells spend most of the year underground in a dormant state only emerging to leaf and flower in the spring, growing from bulbs. blue- or pale green-coloured pollen inside. Does it matter that we have both in the wild? The UK's woodlands are home to almost 50% of the world's population of the bluebell. Bluebell: I was so grateful that day! And if you're wondering how I was able to talk, my old vocal chords wore down big time and they were surgically replaced somehow! The surgeon was very careful when extracting my old chords and connecting my new ones in! I think I like having actual vocals! Reply.
