Abstract

Australia at Work is a longitudinal study of 8,341 Australians to examine people's working lives in a continually changing industrial relations environment. The research participants will be contacted once a year for five years (2007 to 2011) to find out how their working lives are changing. The Australian labour market is experiencing a period of substantial change, within both the economic and industrial relations environments. This third annual Australia at Work report provides a first look at how these changes are impacting on working life. The report distinguishes between changes that have occurred in the last year, during the economic downturn, and the ongoing dynamics of the Australian labour market. The purpose of this report is to provide a first descriptive take of the most recent data in order to generate debate about how Australian working life is evolving both in the short and longer term.

Many foreigners working in Australia noted that people here are sticklers for punctuality. This might be in direct contrast with our overall positive attitude, but it's in line with the workplace culture in Australia. Because there's so much work to do in a single day, time management is very important. Arriving late, even by as little as five minutes, won't win you any sympathy. What's more, your co-workers may think that you're wasting their time. #11 – Australians Like to Keep Things Casual in a Business Setting. People around the world appreciate our sense of humour. We use it a lot in our daily lives, as well as in our work. In meetings, we often crack a joke or two to ease the tension and break the ice. When something goes wrong, we don't like to stress and whine. A year or two working in Australia will help you develop essential career skills like team building, working under pressure or building relationships (such as life-long mates). This new knowledge will ensure you make a splash and stand out upon returning home. You know what looks good on your CV? Australia. Through comprehensive research carried out with employers and employees across Australia and New Zealand, EY found that change at the organisational level is accelerating through investment in AI, blockchain and machine learning. In stark contrast, complacency regarding readiness still pervades both upper levels of business and government as well as the broader workforce. In so doing, we play a critical role in building a better working world for our people, for our clients and for our communities.
