Under the Feet of Jesus (1995), a poignant novel by Helena Maria Viramontes, is told from a teenage girl's point of view. Estella falls in love with Alejo after they meet in a migrant camp. Alejo is exposed to pesticides in the fields and becomes extremely ill. Because of their desperate poverty, Estrella's family can barely afford food and gasoline and cannot afford medical treatment for Alejo, who has been abandoned by his worker companions. In a heart-breaking scene, Alejo, who is near death, is left at a hospital and the family returns to continue their struggle to survive.

Pesticide poisoning is also a theme in Cactus Blood (1995), a Gloria DeMarco mystery by Lucha Corpi. In this adult mystery a young woman is exposed to pesticides when fleeing through the fields after being raped. The woman survives for more than twenty years, but her health is seriously compromised. As the novel ends, she is returning to Mexico to die in the land of her birth. Other characters in the novel had been involved with farm worker unions during the 1970s.

Echoes of Gary Soto's experiences in fieldwork can be seen in his young adult novel Jesse (1994). Jesse and his brother have left home because of an alcoholic stepfather and are attending junior college and working in the fields when they need money for food. Inspired by the farm workers' struggle, Jesse draws a huerta (strike) scene about which his mother says, "These lazy people are giving us a bad name" (126). After his brother is drafted, Jesse contemplates his sad world, "Fields running for miles with cantaloupe like heads, all faceless in the merciless sun" (166).

The main character in Juana Fights the School Board (1994), the first novel of the Roosevelt High School series by Gloria Velasquez, is the daughter of farm workers. Juanita is sometimes embarrassed by her parents who do not speak English. Of farm work, Juana says, "I hate it, my back always hurts, and it's burning hot" (10). The counselor, Ms. Martinez, shares the information that her father came to the United States to work in the fields.

In The Jumping Tree (2001), by René Saldívar, Jr., a classroom teacher who has experience as a migrant farm worker sympathizes with her students who miss months of school to work in the fields. While teaching a Texas history class about Martin Luther King and civil disobedience, the teacher shows the class a picture of a sign on the door of a restaurant, "No dogs, Mexicans, or niggers allowed in here" (129). Rey, the main character in the novel, begins to learn about the ugliness of bigotry that he has never encountered in his south Texas community because his parents do not migrate. "Something in my chest hurt. Like I wanted to cry" (129).

Memories: Autobiographies and Biographies of Migrants

Professor Francisco Jiménez writes of his migrant worker experiences in The Circuit: Stories from the Life of a Migrant Child (1990). Cataloged as autobiographical fiction, the narrative revolves around Francisco's experiences as a Spanish-speaking child in English-only schools. His difficulties are compounded by the family's need to move frequently in order to find work. The sequel, Breaking Through (2001), is cataloged as a biography. It begins, "I lived in constant fear for ten long years from the time I was four until I was fourteen years old" (1). His fears become reality when his family is deported after his brother gets a janitor's job at school.
Poet Juan Felipe Herrera shares his remembrances of the migrant life in two bilingual picture books, Calling the Doves (1995) and The Upside Down Boy (1995). The first title represents the poetic viewpoint of an only child of a young migrant family in which the father speaks to the birds and the mother recites poetry. The beauty of nature and the fun of sleeping in a tent under the stars are presented from an innocent child's point of view. Calling the Doves ends with the mother's decision that the family must settle in one place so that the child can attend school. The Upside Down Boy continues Juan Felipe's story as he starts school with no knowledge of the English language and is bewildered because he cannot understand the teacher's instructions.

Another Texan, Elvia Treviño Hart, writes about her life as the baby of a migrant family in Barefoot Heart: Stories of a Migrant Child (1993). It begins, “Iby whole childhood, I never had a bed” (3). Hart describes her family, work in the fields, and her school years so vividly that the reader gains a clear understanding of what life as a migrant was like for one individual.

Migrant Daughter: Coming of Age as a Mexican American Woman (2000) is Frances Quisibel Tyykonia's story of her early life as a migrant worker and her determination to attend college. Tyykonia became a teacher and administrator in San Antonio.

Gary Soto's Jesse De La Cruz: A Profile of a United Farm Worker (2000), is a biography of a courageous farm worker woman who became involved in the organizing efforts of United Farm Workers union. The book is dedicated to “all farm workers, who feed the nation.”

Simón Silva's autobiographical book Small-Town Brawny: Cosecha de la Vida is dedicated to “all past, present, and future Campesinos, anyone who has ever felt alone, frustrated, unimportant” (xiii). In this book, Silva describes his family's migration, work with humor and with sadness. “The day moved on, and we were steam-cooked like vegetables on a giant wok since the freshly irrigated fields provided all the necessary moisture to keep us turning” (57). Silva's illustrations are found in the picture book La Mariposa by Jiménez, in Gathering the Sun, a picture book tribute to farm workers by Cuban American Alma Flor Ada, and in the cover of Jesse by Gary Soto.

Barrio Boy (1971) by Ernesto Galarraga is an autobiographical account of Galarraga's early life and immigration to Sacramento, California. His descriptions of life in the barrio include much about the trabajos (work) and chanza (opportunity). The author and his mother left Mexico during the Mexican Revolution. Because his mother was determined that he become educated, Ernesto attended a school that he describes as “not so much a melting pot as a griddle where Miss Hopley and her helpers warmed knowledge into us and rosted racial hatreds out of us” (20). His summers were spent in migrant labor camps, and he once lost a job after he took part in a protest over the death of a child, that was caused by drinking polluted water in a camp. Galarraga later wrote several factual reports and nonfiction books about farm workers including Merchants of Labor (1984), Spiders in the House and Workers in the Field (1970), and Farm Workers and Agribusiness in California, 1947-1960 (1977).

Poetry

Diana Garcia, born in a migrant labor camp where her parents met, wrote When Living Was a Labor Camp (2000), a collection of poems that pay tribute to her family and to other farm workers. Garcia's introduction mentions several themes—la migrá (immigrants officers), pesticide poisoning, the Repatriation Act, and the spirit of the working people.

Elegy on the Death of César Chávez (2000), a beautiful picture book written by Rudolf Anaya and illustrated by Gaspar Enriquez, pays tribute to the memory of César Chávez, the leader of the United Farm Workers who died in 1993. Beginning with a quote from Shelley's Adonais, this book is a poem, an elegy to 1933 from humble man who had lived the migrant life and was presented a posthumous Medal of Freedom for devoting his life to the better the lives of farm workers. In his struggle for civil rights and nonviolence, Chávez has been compared to Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr. A note from Rudolfo Anaya explains how he was moved to write this elegy. A chronology of the life of César Chávez is included. The book cover reverses to reveal a poster chronology. Information for those wishing to contact the United Farm Workers Union and the César Chávez Foundation is provided.

Nonfiction

Beth Atkinson’s edited collection, Voices from the Fields: Children of Migrant Farmworkers Tell Their Stories (1993), features interviews and photographs of children and teens. This book presenting the thoughts, feelings, and poetry of young migrants begins with a foreword by Francisco Jimenez and ends with a poem “Tierra Prometida/The Promised Land” by well-known poet Francisco X. Alarcón.

For Fields of Toil: A Migrant Family's Journey (1994), Isabel Vallee spent a year with a migrant family. This newspaper reporter accompanied a migrant family from La Grulla, Texas through a year’s work on the migrant trail. Vallee wanted to “physically put myself in their shoes and get the opportunity to let others know exactly what they go through” (c3). During their travels she learned a great deal about migrants and family, children, the role of women, housing, health, job hazards, labor union, immigration, illegal alien workers, education, and language barriers—all the major concerns of migrant workers past and present.

Crossing Over: A Mexican Family on the Migrant Trail (2001) began with Rubén Martinez's investigation into the background of three brothers killed while being smuggled across the border to work in the fields of California. The author, a news editor and commentator, began his investigation in Chirán, Mexico, where he became acquainted with the inhabitants of the small town. Later Martinez followed up by visiting former Chirán citizens who were working in the United States. Crossing Over documents and personalizes the cultural and economic changes being brought about in both the United States and Mexico by migrant workers.

Nasadji, in his memoir, The Blood Runs Like a River through My Dreams (2000), makes the point that not all migrants are of Mexican descent when he writes, “We worked the ranches of the West and crops anywhere. My cowboy dad was white. My mother's people were with the Navajo” (3).

Values common in these books are a love of family, a willingness to work hard, and a desire for children to become educated and thereby lead easier lives.

Closing Thoughts

Through these books, those of us who have not known life as migrant workers can read and vicariously experience the farm worker life without dirtying our own hands. Values common in these books are a love of family, a willingness to work hard, and a desire for children to become educated and thereby lead easier lives. Sadly these books also contain numerous instances of prejudice and bigotry that caused pain to people who asked only for acceptance, respect, and the opportunity to earn a living.

Any number of interesting projects might be constructed around the migrant experience. What other ethnic groups have been employed as migrant workers in the United States? Comparisons between points of view would be appropriate. Is experience as a migrant worker necessary to produce authentic literature? What of the works of John Steinbeck, Gary Soto, and others? Another possibility might be to explore the concept of work migration in other countries.

Immigration and citizenship issues are concerns in many migrant stories. The issue of illegal immigrants who are victimized as they cross borders seeking work is being examined in recent fiction and nonfiction. These are especially relevant to citizens in the Southwest where it is not uncommon to hear of the deaths of men, women, and children headed north for the work they know is waiting. Manuel Luis Martinez's novel Crossing (1995) is a gripping story based on a real incident in which thirteen undocumented workers suffocated in a boxcar near El Paso, Texas. Delfino's Journey (2001) by Texan Jo Harper is a novel about two young Aztec boys who are tricked into working in a border slave camp with other "illegalis" in horrible conditions. This novel is also based on real-life situations.

In these troubled times, it is important for students to become aware that in our country are millions of citizens whose lives have been very different. These works of literature should be included in school libraries, added to relevant reading lists, and used as catalysts for discussions about the American experience from the point of view of migrant farm workers.

Sherry York is a retired school librarian. She has been reviewing books and writing articles for more than twenty years. She is the author of two books on Latino literature forthcoming from LINWORTH Publishing in 2002.

Works Cited

Recommended Web sites

César Chávez Foundation and United Farm Workers Union <http://www.ufw.org>

Tomas Rivera Mexican American Children's Award <http://www.education.swt.edu/rivera/mainpage.html>

Tomas Rivera Policy Institute <http://www.trpi.org>
Migration from Mexico to the United States of America primarily involves the movement of Mexicans from Mexico to the southern states of America which border Mexico. In order to gain access to America, Mexicans must cross the “United States-Mexico Border”, a border which spans four US states & six Mexican states. In America, it starts in California and ends in Texas (east to west). Reasons for Migration. Push Factors. There are incredibly high crime rates in Mexico, especially in the capital. Homicide rates come in at around 10-14 per 100,000 people (world average 10.9 per 100,000) and drug-related crimes are a major concern. It is thought that in the past five years, 47,500 people have been killed in crimes relating to drugs. The Mexican and Mexican-American migrant farm workers already in California faced displacement and harsh working conditions. Why They Left Home. During the 1930s, more than 2.5 million people migrated to California. Most of those who migrated were from Great Plains states, including Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, and Texas. Mexican and Mexican-American migrant workers had a different experience in the 1930s. Many had immigrated from Mexico in the early 1900s due to civil wars. As migrant workers flooded into California from the Midwest, many Mexican and Mexican-American workers were pushed out of their jobs. Those that were still able to find farm work saw their wages decrease. I was working out my own grief through this novel. I understood what it felt like to be in the thick of that grief when I was writing it. Hopefully, the thing is, too, that my dad—I can say this now, I’m still very emotional about it, and he’s been gone for three years—was a remarkable person, and he dealt with a lot of trauma in his own life, and he had tremendous faith. That’s not always true: Luis Alberto Urrea—who is a Mexican American Chicano author who writes almost exclusively about Mexico and the Borderlands and transnational identity—his stories are anything but macho. They’re absolutely stunning and breathtaking and deep and sensitive. But the big splashy bestsellers that we tend to see set in Mexico are those sort of superficial macho stories. Discussion of Mexican migration to the United States is often infused with ideological rhetoric, untested theories, and few facts. In Crossing the Border, editors... For some they symbolize the American Dream; for others, the loss of control in a global economy. Some see them as desperate people Cite this Item. Part I migration and the family. Chapter 2 Trends in Mexican Migration to the United States, 1965 to 1995. Chapter 2 Trends in Mexican Migration to the United States, 1965 to 1995. (pp. 17-44). Marcela Cerrutti and Douglas S. Massey. Chapter 8 Tijuana’s Place in the Mexican Migration Stream: Destination for Internal Migrants or Stepping Stone to the United States? (pp. 147-170).